

These are projects that are fiscally sponsored by Sustainable Seattle.

□□□

Alleycat Acres : A collective of city folk who transform vacant spaces to create a network of sustainable urban farms that reconnect people to food while helping to increase food security on a community level. Alleycat Acres is currently developing a neighborhood CSA crafted around a sliding scale, so folks who live in the neighborhoods where there is an Alleycat Farm can opt in on a weekly basis to have fresh produce delivered to their doorstep via bicycle and is creating unique partnerships with youth oriented organizations and schools to assist with adding gardens on existing lands and crafting unique learning experiences for the youth involved. For more information contact Fisher Qua.

Sustainability Ambassadors : Led by Peter Donaldson and Corey Weathers, Sustainability Ambassadors is an innovative youth leadership program training exceptionally motivated young people to track and communicate improvements in sustainable community conditions across generations and community sectors. By analyzing and reporting on community-scale trends, Sustainability Ambassadors help stakeholders prioritize projects for collective impact. This process is leveraged through professional development for middle school and high school teachers using community trend reports to strengthen the relationship between academic rigor, relevant curriculum and community problem solving.

What's Good 206? : A communications organization of young media producers who act as catalysts for positive change in the community, especially concerning youth and their development as civically engaged citizens. The team covers movements, people, and organizations making a profound difference in the Seattle area. Our hope is that others will follow by example. We produce short news magazine segments all led by teams of college and high school students from diverse backgrounds.

Zero Waste Seattle promotes optimal management and conservation of resources, and the reduction of emissions that contribute to global warming, through advocacy and education. Zero Waste Seattle is a non-profit partnership of citizens, organizations and businesses working to promote sustainability through Zero Waste strategies. Zero Waste Seattle accomplishments include ordinances passed by Seattle City Council for opt-out junk mail and phonebooks systems.